

Is There a Global Business in What You Do?

Further Insight — Following Your Question

Prepared for Mike Molloy

An independent assessment by Meridian Intelligence

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL

FURTHER INSIGHT

Mike, the short answer: your history is genuinely rare, but its value is not the breadth. It is one specific combination, and the work now is to narrow to it and turn it into something a client can buy.

What is actually unique

Interning for Fianna Fail and Fine Gael, the House of Commons, Downing Street, the UN and the EU is an impressive CV, but on its own it reads as “well connected” — and well connected is a crowded field (Kissinger Associates, Hakluyt, Teneo all sell access). What almost none of them can credibly offer is the Holy See axis: genuine, current, credibly-held access to the Church set alongside State and capital. That intersection is close to one of one. The peace-process family and the twin priest uncles are not colour on the CV; they are the provenance that makes the faith-institutional access believable in a way that cannot be manufactured or hired. That is the asset. Build the business there, not on the breadth.

What it means commercially

Your background makes three things credible that most advisers cannot touch: (1) faith-institutional and values-aligned capital, connecting the Church, Catholic institutions and mission-aligned investors; (2) navigation between the Church, European statecraft, the UN and government for organisations that need to move across those worlds; (3) discreet, high-trust access and introductions on sensitive matters where provenance is the barrier to entry. That is a narrow, defensible, high-margin practice, not a general geopolitical advisory.

The challenge, honestly put

- 1. Provenance is not a product. Clients do not buy who you have known; they buy what they reliably receive. What does a client get, how often, and for what fee? Until access becomes a repeatable, sellable thing, it is a network, not a company.
- 2. Is the access live? The Vatican and State relationships have to be current and activatable today, not heritage. If they are, you are genuinely one of one. If they are historic, the proposition is a story, not an edge. This is the single point everything turns on.

- 3. Breadth reads as unfocused. The temptation is to offer everything to everyone. The stronger move is to pick one spine, most likely the faith-plus-capital-plus-State axis, and let the rest feed it.

The one line to hold onto: you are not a geopolitical generalist with good contacts; you are potentially the one person who can move credibly between the Holy See, European statecraft and serious capital. Narrow to that, prove the access is live, and turn it into two or three things a client can buy, and it is a genuinely strong business.

Meridian Intelligence · Prepared for Mike Molloy · Follow-up to the Independent Strategic Assessment · 25 July 2026 · Private and confidential.